Mourning and Melancholia (German: Trauer und Melancholie) is a 1918 work of Sigmund Freud, the founder of psychoanalysis. In this essay, Freud argues that mourning and melancholia are similar but different responses to loss. In mourning, a person deals with the grief of losing of a specific love object, and this process takes place in the conscious mind.

Mourning and Melancholia - Wikipedia

Freud compares the phenomenon of mourning in melancholia. Both of them are the result of the real loss of a loved object. However, mourning is not considered a pathological condition while melancholia is.

Both responses look similar as far as mood or expression, because they both deal in grief. But while mourning, in Freud's view, is a finite and transforming process, melancholia is a persistent state, and takes root just outside of a person's conscious understanding. In mourning, a person feels their pain for the loss in an external way.

Mourning is regularly the reaction to the loss of a loved person, or to the loss of some abstraction which has taken the place of one, such as one's country, liberty, an ideal, and so on. In some people the same influences produce melancholia instead of mourning and we consequently suspect them of a pathological disposition.
